As the Baby Boomer generation reaches retirement age, organizations of all sizes and entity types are facing the challenge of transitioning to new leadership. Forward-thinking, financially stable organizations have been preparing for it for years. But too many organizations have been unable or unwilling to look beyond their daily work.

Join us March 1 for an informative discussion of the ways some local non-profits have approached leadership transition, including tools you can use to help develop the next wave of leaders throughout your organization and your board.

In our 2011 benchmarking study of local non-profits, only 33 percent of respondents said they have a succession plan in place, and 35 percent said the main reason they would consider a merger would be the retirement or departure of a staff leader. Now is the time to turn the daunting task of transitioning leaders into an opportunity for improvement.
